Why this tool matters

Reclaiming the wealth generated by the collective city, ensuring that the prosperity built by the public is not entirely enclosed behind private walls.

Evidence we produce

A legally binding fiscal framework or contractual exaction (e.g., impact fees, infrastructure levies) designed to redirect a portion of private real estate gains back to the public purse.

Duration & Material

Duration · 6 to 12 months for policy design and negotiation

Material · Real estate appraisal data, municipal zoning laws, developer agreement templates

Reference case

The New Urban Agenda explicitly advocates for developer exactions and impact fees as powerful value capture tools. Developers are required to pay upfront charges to cover the cost of extending utility networks or are mandated to set aside land for public use in exchange for development rights. This mechanism is utilized successfully globally, including through joint development agreements and density bonuses, ensuring urban population growth directly finances its own require...
